Emerging markets have played an important role in the global economy not only in good time but also during global crises. Various scholars claim that emerging markets perform much better during global crises than the advanced economies. However, there is much to be done in order to maintain the durability, resilience, and sustainability of these economies in the long run.

The ongoing COVID-19 pandemic has hit the global economy severely. However, most of the global agencies like IMF and World Bank firmly forecast that the global economy will significantly recover in the next few years. In the short-term, there remains significant uncertainty as the recovery is dependent on various factors, including the rollout of vaccination, the effectiveness of generous stimulus packages, the effectiveness of government programs to heal the economy from increasing inequality, and harmful effects of the pandemic.

An important feature of emerging economies is the increasing role of governmental intervention and resilience of both public and private sector firms. Further, the role of institutional development is also important to fuel economic growth in emerging markets. This is becoming more pronounced during post-pandemic time.

This special issue call for papers investigating the role of government, public and private sector firms, and the impact of institutional developments on the economy in emerging markets.

This special issue will consider papers examining the following issues but not limited to: business development, firm innovation, firm performance, institutional development, etc.. in the context of emerging markets.

- Business development
- Entrepreneurship
- Institutional development
- Innovation
- Firm performance
- FDI
- Business Model

If you have a topic in mind, please do not hesitate to send an extended draft or proposal to the guest editor, Professor Xuan Vinh Vo, to email vinhvx@ueh.edu.vn.
